

Jarod Russell's experience serving as a public educator for seven years provides him with an intimate understanding of how public schools operate.

After serving as a public educator for seven years, Jarod Russell decided to pursue his dream of going to law school. This, coupled with a master's degree in Educational Leadership, allows him to skillfully guide school officials through the legal requirements and complexities involved in operating a school district. He now counsels public schools and offers legal advice based on his invaluable experience in public education. He regularly gives presentations to school administrators and school board members on a variety of school law topics.
